

Receptive Field

Introduction

The receptive field of a neuron consists of any stimulus that changes the neuron's firing rate. By definition, every neuron has a receptive field, although the receptive fields for some neurons are very complicated. It is often the case that a neuron responds only when light falls within a certain part of the visual field. Moreover, the light can have excitatory or inhibitory effects, depending on where it falls in the receptive field. Identifying the region of the receptive field and the excitatory and inhibitory parts provides a good deal of information about the role of the neuron in visual perception.

Part I

Student Projects and Critical Thinking Exercises

- 1) The definition of the receptive field in the present CogLab may be a bit dated. The new research area considers an additional dimension of time and defines receptive fields in the joint domain of space and time. Have students review the literature for further information on this new research area.
 - a. Have them consider why the new line of research has been expanded or what anomalies could not be explained by previous theories.
- 2) Not all animals have complex visual systems because they may rely on other senses to survive. As a critical thinking project, ask students to pick an animal with a complex visual system and research its visual capacities, including receptive fields, and visual receptors.
 - a. When considering this project, direct students to think about the evolutionary development of the visual systems.
 - b. Some students may want to write their paper from a development or evolutionary perspective, including selective pressures for any evolutionary changes to occur.

Part II

Possible Test Questions

Basic or Introductory Questions

- 1) What is the difference between simple and complex receptive fields?

Answer: A simple receptive field is sensitive to light on only one fixed side. A complex receptive field can respond to light on either side of its receptive field, but it does not respond well to light on both sides of its receptive field.

- 2) In the practice examples, what did the green and red color fields represent in a receptive field?

Answer: The locations of the green and red pixels correspond to the location in visual space of the receptive field. The green region represented the excitatory area and the red region was the inhibitory area.

- 3) What are action potentials, and when do they occur?
