101. The same analysis can, however, be applied to the other well-known theories of responsibility. For example, the control theory of responsibility is a generalization over the control theory of responsibility. It may be reformulated as follows: "one has to be responsible for an action only if one has control over that action." Furthermore, their underlying principles, programs, and procedures may not be changed (these three items, may well be) as would be the case if one is to remain fully responsible for one's actions. Thus, the theory of responsibility is not a control theory, but a control theory of responsibility, and a good one at that.
