Daily Life During the American Revolution Andrew Marcus Sterling, The morning sun cast long shadows across the cobblestone streets of Philadelphia as Martha Caldwell stepped from her modest two story home her wooden bucket in hand Like thousands of other colonial women on this crisp October morning in 1775 she began her daily pilgrimage to the nearest well her thoughts occupied not merely with the mundane task of drawing water but with the unsettling news that had reached the city just days before British troops were advancing and the Continental Congress was in heated debate about the future of the colonies Yet life as it always did continued its relentless march forward demanding attention to the immediate needs of survival and sustenance The daily existence of colonists during the American Revolution was a delicate balance between the extraordinary circumstances of war and the ordinary demands of human survival While historians often focus on the grand strategies of generals and the eloquent speeches of founding fathers the true story of the Revolution lies in the countless small acts of perseverance performed by ordinary people who found themselves caught in the crosscurrents of history These men and women faced challenges that would test not only their political convictions but their very ability to maintain the basic foundations of civilized life Colonial society in the 1770s was predominantly agricultural with roughly ninety percent of the population living in rural areas and depending directly or indirectly on farming for their livelihood The typical colonial family owned between fifty and one hundred acres of land though this varied considerably by region In New England where the soil was rocky and the climate harsh farms tended to be smaller and more diversified with families growing a variety of crops and keeping livestock for both sustenance and trade The southern colonies blessed with warmer climates and richer soil developed a plantation system that relied heavily on tobacco rice and indigo as cash crops supported by the labor of enslaved Africans
