INTRODUCTION

The VK4003 is a camera body which fully fits into the video 400 camera system.

Using a Newvicon pick-up tube, the camera has a very high sensitivity allowing video filming in living-room levels of illumination without additional lighting. The VK4003 is capable of registering very acceptable images with levels of illumination as low as 10 lux! To prevent burning-in and lagging, a bias light has been incorporated.

It was possible to incorporate the electronic viewfinder in the camera body.

When the wrist-strap is removed, a standard 1/4" whitworth threaded opening is revealed.

When use is made of one of the special video 400 zoom lenses, exposure control is fully automatic.

The controls have been kept to a practical and easy-to-manage minimum.

First there is the trigger switch.

The trigger switch can be locked to keep the video recorder in the record mode.

When pressed again, the lock is released and returns to the stand-by mode.

The handgrip is provided with a connector which can be used for remote control of the trigger function.

Next there is the indoor/outdoor switch to be used to compensate for difference in colour temperature between natural daylight and artificial light.

This camera also features an automatic white balance. You only have to aim the camera at a white object and press the knob on the side of the camera. A black marker in the electronic viewfinder indicates that, when continuously shown, the white balance is correctly set. For making scene transitions smoother, the fade feature is provided.

When the fade switch is in the "ON" position at the trigger start, there is a fade from black screen into full-frame focus. The second pull at the trigger switch fades out the picture to a black screen.

Parallel to video also the audio signal is faded in and out.
