

1—Do you bring the names of other men into the conversation to give yourself a sought-after appearance?

Don't. This may give a man a sense of inferiority—he is uncomfortable with you, and soon drifts away to someone else. It may make him wonder how much talking you do about him.

2—Do you wear clothes that make you a little more up-to-the-minute than the other women in your set?

Good—provided your taste is reliable and that the clothes suit you. Men may rant about that “crazy hat” but they swell with pride when their lady companions arouse admiring stares.

3—If you are asked to get another girl for a foursome, do you pick one obviously less attractive than you are?

You are unwise to do so. Get the most glamorous girl you know, and both men will be pleased.

4—Do you make a point of building up other women, even those you dislike, in discussing them with a man?

This is sound practice. But don't put it on so thick that it sounds like a line.

5—Do men marvel at your capacity for holding liquor?

A great mistake: it gives you a fast reputation and runs into money—the man's money—besides.

6—How many comfortable chairs are there in your living room?

At least two, I hope. No man can fall in love unless he has a chance to relax and he can't if either of you sits bolt upright.

7—Do you keep men interested by hinting that later—not tonight—you'll be really demonstrative?

This is a low trick and one that a surprising number of men see through at once. If you kiss a man, it should be for your own pleasure and not a reward for him.

8—Do you make things easier for a man by suggesting that he climb into a car first, if he's driving, or by asking him not to stand up when you come into the room?

This is an error—men know that they are supposed to show these signs of consideration to a girl and they respect her more if she takes them as a matter of course.
