

- An argument is invalid if some flow in logic means the premises do not directly lead to the conclusion

→ Begging the Question Fallacy

- Begging the Question Fallacy: assuming the conclusion's truth, dodging the question, or raising the question
- Key points to keep in mind:
 - Fallacy has several distinct interpretations, all of which are valid & in wide circulation among English users
 - It does not have to take the form of a question & does not really involve begging
 - Can be intentional or a mistake
 - It's functionally equivalent to 'circular reasoning' → ending an argument by using its beginning without having proven anything
 - It's an epistemic fallacy (a fallacy related to knowledge itself), and an inferential fallacy (an argument that's incorrect because of its wording, not structure)
 - It goes by the Latin term 'petitio principii,' or assuming the original point
- Examples:
 - Skate running late for the meeting because we are behind schedule
 - There's too much voter fraud in elections because many people who cast ballots aren't properly registered to vote
 - This quiz is difficult because its level of challenge is high

→ Equivocation Fallacy

- Equivocation Fallacy (Fallacy of Ambiguity): one or more terms is used equivocally, as though it has only one meaning, when it actually has multiple meanings
- It's a fallacy because while the term being used is consistent throughout the argument, the argument is actually drawing from different concepts → the conclusion does not follow from the actual meaning of the premises
- Examples:
 - No one should learn to argue. This is because arguments harm relationships, which itself is an emotional thing to do. (argument is a matter of ambiguity)
 - My doctor says I'm allergic to bark. Therefore, you cannot bring your barking dog to my house. (bark is a matter of ambiguity)

→ Appeal to Popularity Fallacy

- Popular Appeal Fallacy (Bandwagon Fallacy/Mob Appeal): considered a fallacy of relevance, arguments based on public opinion
- Other fallacy types are related to the popular appeal fallacy such as claims that unpopular opinions must be wrong, or the reverse, that minority opinions must be correct
- The weaknesses of the popular appeal fallacy include the potential that the majority could be wrong (as history has shown) → majority opinions could be based on harmful prejudices & mob mentality at the expense of minority groups & minority opinions
- Popular opinions are not automatically incorrect, and can be proven correct & true by other, more robust, precise, relevant & thorough arguments
