BRINGING DIGITAL REPAIR MANUALS TO THE SHOP FLOOR

Overview

This world-class Electronic Manufacturing Services (EMS) company repairs and manufactures electronic systems for equipment used by all branches of the U.S. Department of Defense. Its engineers and technicians service everything from satellite terminals and radar systems to navigation instruments and electro-optics. The company deployed NVIDIA GPU-accelerated virtual desktops to power tablets and laptops remotely accessing a graphics-intensive digital reference library.

Challenges

In the process of modernizing an aging data center, the company's IT team decided to deploy virtual desktop infrastructure (VDI) across its global facilities. The challenge was using VDI to deliver graphics-intensive digital resources to its engineers and technicians. Every day, its production workforce uses a variety of technical schematics, large PDF documents, CAD drawings, and animated manuals to do complex repair work. Typically, these resources were accessed on PCs in various offices and then printed out. Streaming instructional videos and step-by-step animations weren't transferable.

Technicians traveling to other facilities also needed a better solution. Before going on the road, they checked-out laptops to download and save digital resources. This process introduced security risks and undermined version control when resources were modified.

The IT team wanted to deploy high performance virtual desktops to run on laptops as well as tablets installed directly on the production floor.
