Patients who decide to seek professional help expect to be well looked after so as to be able to continue with their normal activities as soon as possible. An expectation that ultimately depends on a well functioning health care system; one that is accessible at the time of need, that provides well trained staff with good technical and interpersonal skills, and that has the ability to coordinate and integrate patients' care needs. For this to work, the system needs to be adequately resourced and resources have to be effectively spread between the various domains of public, preventive, and supportive/curative care. Most of the time the system works all right, but when things go wrong, fingers point in many different directions. Answers for failure are hard to come by and ultimately the blame is placed on the "system". This book uses the framework of a "complex adaptive system" to de-mystify the dys/function of the health system.

The 28 short essays are presented in seven sections, each preceded by an introduction, which makes the book readily accessible. Almost all of the authors work within the NHS in Britain and they examine and reflect on experiences within this unique system. In part, this is a strength of the book. However, those less familiar with the history and intricacies of the NHS might find some chapters difficult to follow.

Section one provides an introduction to systems and complexity. Unfortunately, the attempt to provide a brief and succinct (rather than a detailed) overview of system and complexity theory makes this section difficult for the novice and superficial for those who understand the issues.

Section two deals with the spectrum of how we think about organizations. These essays introduce the various operational concepts of system approaches, such as cognitive maps, qualitative system dynamics or qualitative politicized influence diagrams. These operational concepts are then conceptually expanded to thinking about organizations as "learning systems", thereby challenging the belief that organizations can be engineered and controlled. Instead, leadership in learning organizations operates on the basis that understanding the interactions between its people is the vehicle to success.

Section three "Complexity perspectives on healthcare organization" sets the scene for the rest of the book. Healthcare systems are explored through the concept of complex adaptive systems. The centre of the system is the patient-healthcare professional and his relationships with all other parts of the system. In this system
