

Note: The valve will not protect the installation against dangerous system pressures !
Before operating the compressors the pressure switches and other safety devices must be installed correctly.
Maximum allowable pressures must not be exceeded.

For connecting a high-pressure switch there is a tapped hole with plug in 1/8" – 27 NPTF on each cylinder head.

Maximum Operating Pressures

Maximum operating pressures (according to pr EN 12693) shown on the compressors nameplate are obligatory and must not be exceeded.

High pressure side (HP)

28.0 bar

Low pressure side (LP)

22.5 bar

Note: The compressor operating range may be restricted for various reasons, check the application range limitations in the Copeland Selection software on www.copeland.com

Compressor cooling

Compressor motors must always be cooled, and cylinder head cooling may also be needed at certain operating conditions.

D/K and D/L compressor motors can utilise air or water-cooling. For air cooling, the airflow should be at least 18,5 m³/hr. Note that the airflow also cools the cylinder heads. This airflow can come from the fan of an air-cooled condenser or from a separate fan. Some high pressure ratio conditions may require additional head cooling.

For water cooling, the water is led through a water coil wound round the motor section. Usually the water coil is connected before the water-cooled condenser. With mains water, a single coil "W" is used, and with cooling-tower connection a split coil "W2" is used. To improve heat transmission, the water coil is embedded into thermocement on motors >0,75 HP but smaller than 4 HP. If cylinder head cooling is also required, an additional fan must be installed with water-cooled compressors.

With suction gas-cooled compressors, the motor is cooled by refrigerant gas that is led over the motor. An additional fan, and in some cases an oil cooler, may be required depending upon the operation condition (see Selection software). For additional fan and oil cooler mounting instructions, please see below.
