Interpretation of the data is inconsistent, however, and the degree of risk is still unclear. The risk of developing cancer is low (1 in 10,000) and, although many researchers believe that a relationship exists, it is not clear to what.

Also, the data indicate that certain groups are having children at much higher rates than others, and this may be a factor. In 1990, 30 percent of women and nearly half of men were in a non-marital partnership. The increase of non-marital living arrangements and the increase in the number of children born to women in such relationships may be a factor in the increasing rates of cancer. The number of children born to women in such relationships may be a factor in the increasing rates of cancer.
