

The Amazon forest leaves its mark on the imagination of all who see it. It is one of nature's exaggerations. Watching the great white river, which viewed across white sandbars and other banks out of sight, could be an ocean. The world's trees grow in the forest's larger than Europe. It extends its umbrella over a vast, damp, crepuscular corner of a continent shown as blanks on the map between the veining of rivers and has little legend and no history.

Romantic explorers and holy madmen like the Englishman Donald Fyson paddled their canoes on the river and searched the jungle in search of hidden cities. But trees and plants hid the heart of the jungle as the trees hid the details of the centuries of exploration. The trees provide the final refuge of hundred odd Indian tribes, numbering perhaps forty thousand. They believed that almost as many have disappeared since the turn of the century, more through outright murder, more through the white man's diseases against which the Indian has no immunity. Occasionally a new Indian group is found - flushed out of the trees by pioneers who cut the trails ahead of the road-building gangs - and when this happens about a quarter of those 'contacted' can be expected to die of one common place Western ailment or another within the year. Indians are entirely dependent upon the forest. They cannot survive outside it.

Theodore Roosevelt, spokesman and clairvoyant of the world of quick profits, pondered over the Amazonian vacuum and predicted what was to come. He had written a book about the pleasures of ranching, but had little use for trees. 'The country along this river,' he wrote in 1912, 'is fine natural cattle country, and one day it will see a great development.' His judgment as to the suitability of the land for cattle ranching was abysmally wrong; his prediction at least half correct. The ranchers arrived and the great attack on the trees began. Sixty years later the Brazilian people were to learn that about a quarter of the forests of the Amazon Basin and Mato Grosso had already been destroyed. Eleven million hectares of trees had been cleared in the preceding decade alone, and it became a matter of simple arithmetic, if this were allowed to go on, to forecast a date when the forest would cease to exist altogether.

With the growing suspicion that the multinationals who did most of the clearing were little concerned with the long-term problems of the nation, voices were raised to inquire whether the fate of the forest, which had more than turned out to be a new and, might not in the long run have some influence on the climate. The mild obsession, familiar in the tropics, over the possibility of the return of the Ice Age, is replaced in the tropics with a conviction that the reverse is likely to happen. In Peru a loss of permanent snow has been recorded from the Andean ice
