CHAPTER FOUR

Government Model Pistols 1919 to 1924

Serial Range C or W 10400-C13532

Following World War I, Colt continued to fill military and British orders already in progress. Small commercial back orders, and transient American orders. In 1919, the serial range extended from about C or W 10400 to about C12000. Caliber .45 and .455 pistols with a C or W prefix were manufactured through W11000. During this time Government Model pistols were manufactured in the same style as before the war, but shortly after the termination of wartime contracts (April 1919) Colt initiated a program to improve the pistol's design. Due to the high percentage of rejection in January 1920, some of the changes were apparently introduced at that time, as a total of 35 pistols were scrapped. Of this total, 29 were scrapped on January 18, the largest number of rejections ever recorded in the line. Rejections were reported during subsequent periods, but they were never that great.

From January 1920 until February 1924, in the serial range from about C11000 to C13532, the Government Model underwent 40 revisions (commencing at about C12000). These consisted mostly of a general tightening of tolerances and improving the manufacturing process. New-style slide markings signify manufacture in accordance with these new general rules. (See Fig. 2 below.) Calibers and capacities were variations in the serial range from an earlier time. These pistols were a significant improvement over World War I pistols, but new markings were later discarded. (See pages 49 and 51.)

Other than markings, the revisions included: 1) receiver, slide, 7) magazine housing, 3) safety lock, 8) barrel, 2) ejector, 5) barrel banding, 1) trigger, 1) slide stop, 1) grip safety, 1) magazine catch, 1) front sight, 1) rear sight, 1) magazine, 1) barrel band, 1) barrel spring, 1) magazine spring, 1) and magazine base pin, 1. Most of the changes were incorporated into military transition pistols in 1924. Serial numbers of these revisions were not recorded, but modifications began in 1920. The following are the more obvious changes:

1. The thing was virtually identical to previous commercial pistols. The surface preparation was the same, the only difference being the change from gold finish to gas-fired steel finish. (Colt changed to chemical finish after World War II.)
2. In January 1920, slide markings changed to a new format beginning in the C11000 serial range, but during 1919, old-style markings continued through C12000 due to Colt's need of expediting manufacturing process. Consequently, pistols numbered C12000-C12000 may be found with either style slide marking. Pistols in this serial range with the old-style marking were produced in 1919, while pistols with the new-style marking were produced in 1920. (See Figures 4-1 and 4-2.)
