

scene in that sick room, it may be readily imagined, was most affecting, but nothing went to my heart like the tender earnestness with which that mother urged them to partake of what she had taken so much pains to cook and season, as they "used to like it ;" and the expression of disappointed sadness, with which she watched their ineffectual efforts to gratify her by complying with her request. It brought back corresponding experiences of my own, in "the days of the years gone by," so forcibly, that I could hardly keep a cheerful countenance. How many mothers will sympathize from their hearts with those emotions ! Anna inquired with affectionate interest after all her young friends whom I knew, and added, "Tell Mary," (who was absent at school,) "that she must write me one of her own cheerful funny letters, such as she always has;" (they had been correspondents for some time, and the artless originality of Anna's letter had furnished us with much amusement,) "she need not feel as if she must be gloomy and sad because I am soon going away !" "She does not feel so on your account, by any means, my child," I re-
