Excelsior and Other Stories Sir Pelham Grenville Wodehouse, The room was the typical bedroom of the typical boarding house furnished insofar as it could be said to be furnished at all with a severe simplicity It contained two beds a pine chest of drawers a strip of faded carpet and a wash basin But there was that on the floor which set this room apart from a thousand rooms of the same kind Flat on his back with his hands tightly clenched and one leg twisted oddly under him and with his teeth gleaming through his grey beard in a horrible grin Captain John Gunner stared up at the ceiling with eyes that saw nothing Until a moment before he had had the little room all to himself But now two people were standing just inside the door looking down at him One was a large policeman who twisted his helmet nervously in his hands The other was a tall gaunt old woman in a rusty black dress who gazed with pale eyes at the dead man Her face was quite expressionless The woman was Mrs Pickett owner of the Excelsior Boarding House The policeman s name was Grogan He was a genial giant a terror to the riotous element of the waterfront but obviously ill at ease in the presence of death He drew in his breath wiped his forehead and whispered Look at his eyes ma am Mrs Pickett had not spoken a word since she had brought the policeman into the room and she did not do so now Constable Grogan looked at her quickly He was afraid of Mother Pickett as was everybody else along the waterfront Her silence her pale eyes and the quiet decisiveness of her personality cowed even the tough old salts who patronized the Excelsior She was a formidable influence in that little community of sailormen That s just how I found him said Mrs Pickett She did not speak loudly but her voice made the policeman start He wiped his forehead again It might have been apoplexy he hazarded Mrs Pickett said nothing There was a sound of footsteps outside and a young man entered carrying a black bag Good morning Mrs Pickett I was told that Good Lord The young doctor dropped to his knees beside the body and raised one of the arms After a moment he lowered it gently to the floor and shook his head in grim resignation He s been dead for hours he announced When did you find him Twenty minutes back replied the old woman I guess he died last night He never would be called in the morning Said he liked to sleep on Well he s got his wish What did he die of sir asked the policeman It s impossible to say without an examination the doctor answered It looks like a stroke but I m pretty sure it isn t It might be a coronary attack but I happen to know his blood pressure was normal and his heart sound He called in to see me only a week ago and I examined him thoroughly But sometimes you can be deceived The inquest will tell us He eyed the body almost resentfully I can t understand it The man had no right to drop dead like this He was a tough old sailor who ought to have been good for another twenty years If you want my honest opinion though I can t possibly be certain until after the inquest I should say he had been poisoned Death at the Excelsior and Other Stories P.
