Design Guide for Structural Hollow Section Columns Exposed to Fire L. Twilt, 1994-01 This design guide the fourth in the CIDECT series Construction with hollow steel sections deals with the fire protection of hollow steel section columns exposed to fire One of the major advantages of hollow section columns is to make fire protection possible by using methods other than the classic addition of materials on the external surface namely by water or concrete filling Not only the water cooled or concrete filled columns require markedly less space thus giving an appreciable increase in the usable volume but also they add to the slim and aesthetic appearance of the construction All three fire protection methods external protection by plaster asbestos or vermiculite as well as intumescent paints and coatings cooling by water static or circulating and concrete filling have been described in this book with design examples to make them easy to be applied by the user Back cover Design Guide for Hollow Structural Section Connections J. A. Packer, J. E. Henderson, Canadian Institute of Steel Construction, 1992
