There is a noticeable trend that the more the number of variables in the model, the more the model is overfitted. This is a common problem in machine learning, and it is important to be aware of it when building models. One way to avoid overfitting is to use a model with a smaller number of variables, or to use a model that is less sensitive to the training data. Another way to avoid overfitting is to use a model that is more robust to noise, such as a decision tree or a neural network. In general, it is important to strike a balance between the number of variables in the model and the model's ability to generalize to new data.
