The evolution in conceptualization of sexual desire has stimulated many attempts to measure it. However measures able to assess multiple expressions of desire in all sexual identities are still lacking. The main aim of the present study was to test the psychometric properties of the Sexual Desire and Erotic Fantasies questionnaire - Part 1 Sexual Desire (SDEF1), developed as a sex-positive measure of different sexual desire expressions. The SDEF1 was assessed in 1773 participants from the Italian general population (1105 women, 645 men, and 23 other genders; ranged between 18–78 years old, mean age 29.31 ± 10.35) on an online survey, together with the Sexual Desire Inventory - 2, the International Index of Erectile Function, the Female Sexual Function Index, and the Marlowe–Crowne Social Desirability Scale-Short Form. Results support a factorial structure of six dimensions, including 28 items and accounting for 58.11% of the total variance: sexual desire, negative feelings to sexual desire, autoerotic desire, regular partner desire, attractive person desire, and responsive desire. The confirmatory factorial analysis showed satisfactory indexes (RMSEA = 0.042 [90% CI = 0.039–0.045]; GFI = 0.97; NFI = .96; and CFI = 0.97). Regression coefficients ranged from 0.39 to 0.94 and were all statistically significant ($p < 0.001$). The SDEF1 showed good psychometric properties such as internal reliability, construct, and discriminant validity, and to differentiate women and men with and without sexual difficulties. Men reported significantly higher levels of desire than women in all areas except for desire for a regular partner, where no gender difference was detected. Desire for autoerotic activity was the factor accounting for more variance explained among genders (11.7%). The SDEF1 could be a useful measure to assess different areas of sexual desire and its use could be recommended for clinical and research purposes.

INTRODUCTION

Desire is often defined as the subjective psychological status for initiating and maintaining human sexual behavior, triggered by internal (feelings, thoughts, erotic fantasies) and/or external (attractive partners/situations, pornography) stimuli [1–3]. It refers to feelings and thoughts that motivate individuals to approach or be receptive to sexual stimulation [4]. Over time, researchers and clinicians seemed to agree that sexual desire is a complex construct and moved away from simplistic unidimensional definitions toward multidimensional models [5]. The evolution in conceptualization of desire has stimulated all the attempts to measure desire over time, however no available measure is able to assess multiple expressions of desire in all sexual identities, an element that could be useful for further clinical assessment of sexual desire difficulties. The most used self-reported questionnaires of sexual desire in the literature will be briefly discussed in the following paragraphs, highlighting strengths and limits to give the reader an overview of the available measures. After the development and the validation process of a new measure that attempts to overcome some of the limits and integrate some strengths will be presented.

SELF-REPORTED MEASURES OF SEXUAL DESIRE - UNIDIMENSIONAL MEASURES

Historically, early attempts to measure desire focused on desire outputs such as frequency of sexual activity and masturbation rather than the feeling of desire experienced by the individual. Moreover, single item Likert scales (e.g., How often do you feel like having sex?) were preferred, assuming that sexual desire was unidimensional and easy to describe [3, 6–8]. This bias is still common today, where desire is often measured by overemphasizing sexual behaviors rather than cognitions and feelings, underestimating that having sex does not necessarily imply desiring it (and vice versa). In this sense, Meston and Buss [9] have shown many reasons why people can be motivated to engage in sexual activities, and sexual desire fits only with some of them. In their works on sexual functioning, Rosen et al. [10, 11] focused on desire as a single dimension as reported in the International Index of Erectile Function (IIEF) and the Female Sexual Function Index (FSFI). In these questionnaires, sexual desire is measured as the level and the frequency of perceived desire to engage in sexual activity. In this sense, it is suggested a conceptualization of desire as spontaneous for the individual, in the sense that it rises
