

A Curricular Plan for the Writing Workshop
By Lucy Calkins and Colleagues from TCRWP
Grade 6 Unit Map

Unit #1: Raising the Level of Personal Narrative and Edging Toward Memoir	Time: September
Overview Narrative writing is an essential life skill and is a key ingredient in all non-narrative forms as well. This unit stresses the importance of students incorporating all they know about narrative writing right from the start of the year. Since your students should by now be quite familiar with the rituals of a writers' workshop, it is not necessary to spend weeks establishing them. A quick review and reflection should suffice with particular attention paid to the use and importance of writers' notebooks. Additionally, it is important to reinforce the notion that the goal of writing workshop is to lift the level of one's writing. An on-demand writing assessment should be given very early to gauge what students know about narrative writing. This task will likely show that the most students have an understanding of the essentials of narrative writing and are ready to write one effective personal narrative during the unit. After a few days of entry writing, students will be ready to reread all their entries (maybe during a share session) and select one seed idea for the narrative they will eventually publish. They will then spend a few days rehearsing before devoting one intense day to a first draft. Lessons on revision will focus on students rereading, rethinking, and envisioning their stories with a focus on storytelling versus summarizing. As students learn about narrative writing, some of the lessons will be explicit (taught through minilessons and conferences) and some implicit (by looking at mentor texts). Students need to know that their ideas matter and their voices count. This unit provides opportunity for both student and teacher to honor this. Part One: Generating Narrative Writing • Study a mentor text as a means of inspiration and emulation • Review/Remind students of their repertoire of strategies for topic generation and the expectation that it take no more than five minutes to complete this process • In a single day while generating ideas, writers produce more than one entry • Ideas for narratives can come from turning points, emotions, or major issues Part Two: Revising Your Students' Knowledge of Narrative Writing Even Before They Write Their Draft • Remind/Reteach the essentials of narrative writing (zoom in, movie in the mind, create a timeline etc.) • Writers select a seed idea and rehearse for writing Part Three: Writing a Rough Draft Quickly • Using their timeline and movie in their mind write a draft quickly i.e. "flash-draft" (one class period?) • Teachers should be monitoring student writing to assure storytelling rather than summarizing Part Four: Revising Drafts • Assess and determine need for small group strategy instruction e.g., students who are using too much dialogue • Good writing comes from a variety of thought, action, and dialogue
