

course be kept in mind that these entries are self-selecting in a lot of cases. Thus those people who have not returned their forms with details will be omitted from the listing.

The Europa Yearbook in two volumes contains wide-ranging information on various international organisations around the world — both intergovernmental and non-governmental — as well as details on the 160 odd states. International organisations and the countries from Afghanistan to Jordan are listed in Volume One and Kampuchea to Zimbabwe in Volume Two.

We are given relevant details concerning the United Nations and its agencies, the European Communities, the Organisation for African Unity, and so on. There are listings for the numerous regional institutions as well as those involved in the finance, arts, sport, etc.

For each of the countries listed there is a brief introductory survey including recent history. There are then sections on government, defence, economic affairs, education, and tourism. The statistical survey covers area and population, and the current state of industry, agriculture, fishing, finance, and external trade.

The main section for each country is the Directory which is concerned with the Constitution, the Government, Legislature, and Judicial system of each country. There are also entries for the institutions involved in publishing, radio, trade and industry, and finance among other things.

The sources drawn on for this book are national statistical offices, government departments, diplomatic missions, as well as some UN publications. This is something that must obviously be borne in mind because of the built-in bias of the statistics quoted. Also, while the attempt is made to standardise the information, it must be remembered that the diverse sources make this a difficult task. Nonetheless this book will be invaluable as initial reference material — Millennium has had cause to refer to it now and again — and would seem to be a requisite for every self-respecting academic library.

DAVID LONG

David Long is a research student in the Department of International Relations at the London School of Economics.

Kjell Goldmann, Sten Berglund and Gunnar Sjostedt, Democracy and Foreign Policy: The case of Sweden (Aldershot: Gower, 1986, 206pp, £19.50).

It is often asserted that democracy and foreign policy cannot be combined, that they are incompatible. This idea is supported from a variety of political perspectives. There are those who, echoing Schumpeter, contend that the remoteness of foreign policy from the everyday life of citizens means that voters are capable of adopting only irrational or blinkered preferences. There are others, on the Left, who see the prime determinants of foreign policy as lying well beyond the control of individuals or nation-states. There are, as the authors point out, many other arguments for the view that democracy is ill-equipped to manage foreign policy. While this contention is widely held, it is rarely examined in detail. This is the great strength of Democracy and Foreign Policy.
