

All cartoon characters are based on real people

All cartoon heads, regardless of the style of drawing, are based on real people. To turn a real head into a cartoon head you must do two things: (1) Eliminate detail and (2) magnify outstanding characteristics. This enables you to express the feelings and personality of the character clearly and sharply.

To show you what we mean, we had four cartoonists draw their interpretations of three models. Their drawings, ranging from the realistic to the highly stylized, appear below. Note that each man has created a unique and individual cartoon while expressing the type and personality of the model.

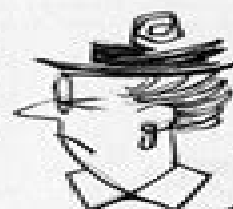

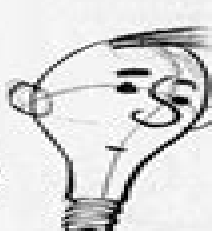

The realistic or adventure-type heads in this column are closest to the live models. Still, much detail has been eliminated.

By simplifying the features—particularly the eyes and hair—the heads can be cartooned in a semi-realistic manner.

With more exaggeration of the outstanding features and further simplification of outlines, the characters become pure cartoons.

Even with extreme exaggeration and stylizing, the heads in this column are still essentially the same as those in the first column.

Practice drawing different types of heads

Don't be satisfied to perfect yourself in drawing just a few types of heads; and then go on repeating them forever. Continue to practice both from observation and memory. There are over two billion potential characters on this earth, so you should never be at a loss for a fresh model. Remember that "you learn to draw by drawing."
