Figure 2. This proposal to reallocate existing positions may produce that a decrease in employees will not be immediately noticeable. It is very important to understand that although this reallocation is a finite organizational change, it may require other organizational adjustments to achieve the final goal(s). Changes will need to be continually implemented to meet customer needs in other ways.

resources, as well as opportunities for changing or even creating, are dependent on the nature of the relationships between market participants, all of which have a role.
