Abstract

These two strategies produce results that are, at best, mixed. For example, a number of empirical studies have shown that the use of a "no" response option in a survey can lead to higher rates of non-response, which in turn can lead to higher rates of non-response bias. However, the use of a "no" response option can also lead to higher rates of response, which can lead to higher rates of response bias. The results of these studies are mixed, and the results of these studies are mixed.

Abstract Eighty-five young English speakers were asked to produce a range of English words and phrases. The words and phrases were selected to represent a range of English phonetic and syntactic structures. The words and phrases were produced in a range of contexts. The results of the study are discussed in terms of the phonetic and syntactic structures of the words and phrases and the contexts in which they were produced.
