Patenting of Pharmaceuticals and Development in Sub-Saharan Africa POKU ADUSEI, 2012-10-24 This book critically investigates the patent protection of medication in light of the threats posed by HIV AIDS malaria and tuberculosis epidemics to the citizens of countries in Sub Saharan Africa hereinafter SSA or Africa The book outlines the systemic problems associated with the prevailing globalized patent regime and the regime's inability to promote access to life saving medication at affordable prices in SSA It argues that for pharmaceutical patents to retain their relevance in SSA countries human development concepts must be integrated into global patent law and policy making An integrative approach implies developing additional public health and human development exceptions limitations to the exercise of patent rights with the goal of scaling up access to medication that can treat epidemics in SSA By drawing on multiple perspectives of laws institutions practices and politics the book suggests that SSA countries adopt an evidence based approach to implementing global patent standards in domestic jurisdictions This evidence based approach would include mechanisms like local need assessments and the use of empirical data to shape domestic patent law making endeavors The approach also implies revising patent rules and policies with a pro poor and pro health emphasis so that medication will be more affordable and accessible to the citizens of SSA countries It also suggests considering the opinions of individuals and pro access institutions in enacting crucial pieces of health related statutes in SSA countries The approach in this book is sensitive to the public health needs of the citizens affected by epidemics and to the imperative of building local manufacturing facilities for pharmaceutical research and development in SSA American Indian Literary Nationalism
