

Hammocks

Each seaman had two hammocks, so that he could sleep in one while the other was washed. Hammocks were hoisted in rows on the upper deck.

Hammocks being washed

Dressing officers

Dirty and dampness caused infection of even small cuts and scratches. The officers that survived needed careful dressing.

Foremast

The foremast was the first of the masts of war's three masts.

Washing clothes

Clothes stored in salt water never dried properly, so sailors used the coldest rainwater for rinsing laundry.

Sailor being forced to go to the sick bay

Extra rations

The very sick got extra rations, including "morbidity soup." This was made by boiling down broth to form a gelatin that was easier to transport—than ordinary soup.

Covers cover keeps the hammocks dry

Vinegar being sprinkled in sick bay

Fresh air

Opening the gunport let in fresh air, but in bad weather it let in rain and seawater, too!

Broken legs

Accidents were routine on board ship. Few men survived a fall from the rigging, but the ship's surgeons helped treat lesser fractures by making a splint to keep the broken limb still while it healed.

Portable stove

As ships' surgeons realized that damp was the cause of much disease (especially rheumatism), they came up with portable stoves to dry the decks with portable stoves.

Manger

The ship's manger held the livestock that provided fresh meat for those who were lucky enough to get it, mainly the officers. Pigs and cattle lived here.

The ballast

Ballast on the bottom of the hold kept the ship upright. It consisted of a layer of loose stones, called chulls, spread on top of heavy, flat blocks of iron called "pigs." Ballast was a health risk, because everything drained into it. On some French ships, dead men were buried in the ballast.

Dispensary

This ship's drug supply was kept in the dispensary. Here, seamen could obtain remedies for minor illnesses.

Fire buckets

In an all-wood ship, fire was a constant risk, particularly when stores were in use.

Fumigating

Replacing the ballast was the only sure way to make it healthy, but fumigation was used on many ships. Sailors sprinkled vinegar and brimstone (sulfur) over ballast or hot coals. The clouds of poisonous fumes were supposed to make the germs of the ballast less harmful.

Greening

The bottom of the ship was covered with thin copper plates to stop worms from boring holes in the hull. The copper soon turned green from the seawater.

Sprinkling vinegar

The acid in vinegar was a simple disinfectant, so the surgeon's mates sprinkled it around the sick bay.

Limeys

The surgeon prescribed boxes of lime juice for sailors suffering from scurvy. The word British sailors the nickname "limeys."

"I'm not sick!"

Sick seamen hid their grog (drugs) behind their backs, so many pretended to be well rather than go to the sick bay.
