Abstract—The purpose of this study was to determine whether there were differences in the prevalence of musculoskeletal disorders among different types of workers. The study included 600 male employees from a large manufacturing company who had been employed for at least one year. They were divided into three groups based on their job type: manual laborers, machine operators, and office workers. Data were collected through self-administered questionnaires that assessed various factors related to musculoskeletal health, including work conditions, physical demands, and symptoms. The results showed that manual laborers had the highest prevalence of musculoskeletal disorders, followed by machine operators, while office workers had the lowest prevalence. These findings suggest that the nature of the work environment and the physical demands placed on workers significantly influence the risk of developing musculoskeletal problems.
