

Managing an Oracle Database

Questions and Answers

The database is critical for the operation of the organization. In the SYS schema are manipulative and administrative user or database administrator. You must have the SYS user is granted the SYSDBA privilege, which enables administrative tasks such as backup and recovery.

SYSTEM

This account can perform all administrative functions except the following:

- Backup and recovery
- Database upgrade

While this account can be used to perform day-to-day administrative tasks, it recommends creating named users account for administering the Oracle monitoring of database activity.

DBA and SYSOPER System Privileges

DBA and SYSOPER are administrative privileges required to perform high-level operations such as creating, starting up, shutting down, backing up, or recovering the database. The DBA system privilege is for fully empowered database administrators and the SYSOPER privilege allows a user to perform basic operational tasks, but without the ability to start or stop the database.

The SYSDBA and SYSOPER system privileges allow access to a database instance if the database is not open. Control of these privileges is therefore completely outside the database. An administrator who is granted one of these privileges to start the database.

You can also think of the SYSDBA and SYSOPER privileges as types of connection privileges. When you connect to the database, you must have certain database operations for which privileges cannot be granted if you have the SYSDBA privilege, then you can connect to the database as SYSDBA.

The SYS user is automatically granted the SYSDBA privilege. When you connect to the database as SYS, you must connect to the database as SYS. This privilege invokes the SYSDBA privilege; connecting to the database as SYSDBA Enterprise Manager Database Express.
