

this, but by considering it in the context of Ecgfrith's 'neo-imperial ambitions' (pp. 191–4). Higham also demonstrates how a broader and 'ambitious Romanising agenda' (p. 187) was central to reimposing Northumbrian over-kingship on his neighbours (p. 201).

Yet, as Higham concludes, this proved to be Ecgfrith's undoing. Although Nectanesmere itself led to a new political climate in which 'it would have been impolitic to praise any descendant of Oswiu's' (p. 228), Higham shows how Bede cast Ecgfrith's attack on Ireland as a foil for the authority of the middle party – personified by Cuthbert and Egberht – whose counsel on the matter the king is shown twice to reject (p. 226). With this same party dominating the 'official' record of events, their need to preserve their own ecclesiastical authority amidst political upheaval necessitated that they distance themselves from such a providential conundrum as Nectanesmere. This makes the sad irony of Ecgfrith's legacy that he and his imperium were sacrificed on the altar of political necessity by the very people to whom he had switched allegiance in the interests of peace and reconciliation.

In piecing together Ecgfrith's story, Higham delivers a valuable appraisal of the intimate and delicate relationship between throne and cathedra in early Northumbria. One of this book's most helpful achievements is its analysis of the broader processes which would heavily influence later histories we depend on (sometimes too readily) for our understanding of that time. As such, it offers the reader more than its title might suggest. While it does not presume to answer all our questions, it does offer several new directions that will surely engender further fruitful investigation into this formative period of early Insular history.
