

Chapter 2

Part 1:

- Politics – the activities democratic citizens engage in as they struggle to exercise power over government.
- Politicians and political parties aim to win elections in order to increase their power within the government.
- Citizens will work for campaigns, form interest groups (associations that seek to influence government to benefit association members and/or advance a cause they share a belief in.), start petitions, give speeches, and etc., mainly because they seek to have power over what the government does.
- Elected representatives debate, bargain, compromise, and vote in order to influence the content of laws.
- Lately American politics have become much less healthy over the recent years, compared to the past sense of trust and harmony.
- These days, opposing political parties tend to see each other as threatening and malevolent enemies who must be defeated to save the country.
- Polarized – increasing differences between the two major political parties based mostly on ideology.
- Pernicious polarization – division of society into two mutually antagonistic political camps that view each other as enemies that pose a threat to the country.
