

Chapter 4: Developing Through the Lifespan

Learning Objectives

Developmental Issues, Prenatal Development, and the Newborn

1. Identify three issues that have engaged developmental psychologists.

Nature vs Nurture (How does our genes effect our experiences?)

Continuity and Stages (What parts of development are gradual?)

Stability and Change (Which traits persist through life?)

2. Describe the course of prenatal development, and explain how teratogens affect that development.

First a sperm cell unites with an egg to form a zygote. The zygote's inner cells become the embryo, then in 6 weeks, body organs begin to form/function. By 9 weeks, embryo is recognizably human.

3. Describe some newborn abilities, noting how researchers explore infants' mental abilities.

Babies are born with sensory equipment and reflexes that facilitate their survival and social interactions with adults.

Infancy and Childhood

4. Describe how the brain and motor skills develop during infancy and childhood.

Brain's nerve cells are sculpted by heredity and experience. Their interconnections multiply rapidly after birth, a process that continues until puberty, when a pruning process begins shutting down unused connections.

5. Describe how psychologists have studied attachment differences, and discuss what they have learned.

They have been studied in a strange situation experiments, which show that some children are securely or insecurely attached. Sensitive responsive parents, tend to have securely attached children. Infants form attachments because they become comfortable, familiar, and responsive. At about 8 months, soon after object permanence develops, children separated from their caregivers display stranger anxiety.

6. Describe how childhood neglect or abuse affects children's attachments.
