INTRODUCTION

DHEA metabolites must be separately evaluated to determine if they have actions beyond their role as intermediates in the pathway of sex steroid synthesis. The unusually broad spectrum of biologic applications for DHEA suggests that its hormone action is not solely governed by receptor-mediated responses, or glucocorticoid (GCS) antagonism, although the latter may explain a large measure of DHEA effects. Whether DHEA's hormonal effects are target specific or state dependent requires further study, but the broad range of physiologic effects have clinical implications of therapeutic significance.

To help the reader, recent broad reviews on DHEA and discussion of specific action have been published in our recent text,¹ and in the preceding paper where we have discussed DHEA's metabolic origins, immunologic effects and related glucocorticoid antagonism.²

The CNS and Behavior

DHEA, as a neurosteroid,^{3,4} can be synthesized via cholesterol to pregnenolone, and DHEA synthesis in the brain is independent of systemic endocrine sources and appears to be produced via an oligodendroglial pathway. DHEA and related metabolites have been found in all regions of the brain with no specific regional concentrations. In the rat, the highest exogenous concentration of DHEA uptake was found in the pineal within one hour of its administration. Significant uptake was also found in amygdala, hippocampus, thalamus, midbrain, and frontal cortex. DHEA's pineal localization is of note in view of the pineal control of circadian and seasonal rhythms that affect sexual maturity, mating behavior and sleep patterns. Of interest to this, DHEA's own circadian cyclic production is lost clinically in upper age groups which is accompanied by a fall in DHEA levels.⁵ In regard to these aspects of CNS response, pheochromocytomas can metabolize androgens including DHEA,⁶ which suggests that DHEA may have an influence on the sympathetic nervous system.

DHEAS was used as early as 1952 in both treatment of neurasthenia and therapy for selected schizophrenics where DHEA values were reported to be
