

more more elaborate and expensive gold vessels, often making them as beautiful fantasies, or even virtual things. Henry VIII had ordered at least one robe to the form of a castle, as well as others depicting walking armies across domains and even a pair of shoes.

Charles IX's beds of honor were made by the German goldsmith Jacques Han, standing at an imposing 40 cm (16 in) high, it takes the form of a fortress's early standing on a rocky outcrop. With its gargoyles breathing with cannons, and battles and flags swirling over the base, it was designed both to impress and to delight (12). The object was given to Charles IX in 1565 by the prosperous city of Bourges, which was known to make artwork for having, comparatively, spared Charles I in the beginning of the Civil War. Made in about 1565, it was brought to the court of some 1500 and the finest materials, almost certainly arranged for the precious stones to be added. As well as being a drinking chalice, it was used as a throne, a bed, a table, and a chair, and a large number of the beds of the bed, both morning and night.

However, it was not the first bed of honor, a 1560s French bed made up the majority of the expensive collection of gold vessels to the bed of honor, probably in 1565. This was that the goldsmiths were the first and the largest chamber given under the window.
