

Child development and attachment:

How can we study development:

1. Cross sectional study- studies compare people of different ages
→ drawback: cohort effects and no info on developmental patterns.
 - Focuses on a certain group to a different group of age
 - People born in a different time setting might not be the same as someone born in a different time period
2. Longitudinal study- studies follow people over time
→ selective dropout and expense, take time and money
 - Focuses on a people compared to them self

Quiz:

- Latent learning is important because it shows that learning is not all about reinforcement, you are learning by doing basic things.
- Meltzoff studied imitation of facial movements because a baby can see other people's faces and cannot see their own face. Imitation based on what they feel by looking at other people
- You can learn new material while sleep; cannot

Nature vs nurture

- Discrete vs polygenic traits. Most traits are polygenic and multiple genes interact
- Even eye color is not a matter of simple dominant recessive genes
- A polygenic trait is a characteristic, such as height or skin color, that is influenced by two or more genes.
- Gene expression varies with environment
- Environments can alter brain chemistry and anatomy
 - rats in cages
 - children in orphanages——growing up in a deprived environment ca have negative effects

Adopted or Twins:

- Adopted: Compare the traits of adopted youth to their adoptive and biological parents
 - Similarities to biological parents may represent the influence of nature
 - Similarities to adoptive parents may represent the influence of nurture
- Twins: Twin study: an experiment that assesses the genetic and environmental influence on a trait using monozygotic (identical) or dizygotic (fraternal) twin pairs
 - If traits are more similar in identical twins, the higher the likelihood of genetic (nature) influence
