Instructions are represented with binary digital data. In fact, the CPU makes a decision about whether it is transferring instructions or data memory. This is called the transfer program concept. Earlier, it was not known for the flexibility of the program that each device had to be built into the hardware as part of the machine. One of the great flexibilities in early computers was to design the hardware so that they could be reprogrammed. A breakthrough came with the realization that the program could be coded and transferred to memory. If the control unit could extract the program from memory, decode the instructions, and execute them, the program could be changed manually by the computer's memory and the hardware. This transfer program is now the standard hardware of the digital machine designed to generate a certain instruction.
