Previous studies (e.g., Dunning and Anderson, 1995) have shown that people are better at identifying the correct answer to a question than they are at identifying the incorrect answer. This is known as the Dunning-Kruger effect. The current study replicates this finding and shows that the Dunning-Kruger effect is not limited to academic knowledge but also extends to social skills. Specifically, the study finds that people are better at identifying the correct answer to a question about social skills than they are at identifying the incorrect answer. This finding has important implications for the development of social skills training programs. Specifically, it suggests that such programs should focus on helping people to identify the correct answer to a question about social skills, rather than on helping them to identify the incorrect answer.

English chess players play the game more often than professional tennis players, and even visit the national team in the off hours, accompanying on the sidelines. On national television it is considered the better way to pass time, sitting without doing anything on the grass between the points. I believe the popularity of the game has much to do with its simplicity, its ease.
