

Introduction to Dental Tissues

Chapter 1

Zohaib Khurshid, Sana Zohaib, Shariq Najeem and Sohail Zafar

THE TOOTH

Teeth constitute approximately 20% of the surface area of the mouth, the upper teeth significantly more than the lower teeth. Teeth serve several functions. Mastication is the function mostly commonly associated with human dentition, but teeth also are essential for proper speech.

The tooth proper consists of hard, inert, acellular enamel formed by epithelial cells and supported by the less mineralized, more resilient, and vital hard connective tissue dentin, which is formed and supported by the dental pulp, a soft connective tissue (Fig. 1.1).

The face and jaws of a child are small and consequently can carry few teeth of smaller size. These smaller teeth constitute the deciduous or primary dentition. The deciduous dentition replaced by a permanent or secondary dentition consisting of more and larger teeth.

Anatomically, a tooth consists of a crown and a root (Fig. 1.2); the junction between the two is the cervical margin. The term clinical crown denotes the part of the tooth that is visible in the oral cavity.

Enamel

Development

Enamel has evolved as an epithelially derived protective covering for the crown of the teeth. The cells responsible for the formation of enamel, the ameloblasts, cover the entire surface of the layer as it forms but are lost as the tooth emerges into the oral cavity. The loss of these cells renders enamel a non-vital and insensitive matrix that, when destroyed by any means (usually wear or caries), cannot be replaced or regenerated.

Composition

The enamel is the most highly mineralized tissue in the body, consisting of more than 96% inorganic material in the form of appetite crystals and traces of organic material.

Features

The structural and compositional features allow enamel to withstand large masticatory forces and continual assaults by acids from food and bacterial
