

I. HISTORY

The first formal development of a projective drawing technique was Goodenough (1926) Draw-A-Man Test. She used it solely to estimate a child's cognitive ability as reflected in the quality of the drawing. She assumed that the accuracy and number of details contained indicates the child's level of intellectual maturity. Points were given for the inclusion of different body parts, quality of lines, and connections. Although it has been used for the children ages 4-0 to 15-11, it has been found to be the most accurate for ages 3-0 to 10-0. In 1983, Harris (1963) revised the Draw-A-Man by adding two new forms, a more detailed according system, and a much wider standardization. He suggests not only administering the draw-a-man portion, but also included drawings of the woman and a drawing of the self. The new extended point system included 73 scoring items for the drawings of the man, (compared with Goodenough's 51), 71 items for the drawing of the woman, and 12 point quality scale, with 1 representing the lowest quality and the 12 the highest for the drawing. No scoring system was provided for the drawing. No scoring system was provided for the drawing of the self. The test was standardized on 2,975 boys and girls from ages 5 to 15 with 75 children in each age group. To date the Goodenough - Harris version has been the most psychometrically sound for of interpreting projective drawings.

Machover's (1949) Draw-A-Person (DAP) expanded projective drawings beyond the area of cognitive assessment and into the interpretation of personality. She developed a number of hypothesis based on clinical observation and intuitive judgment. For example, she speculated that the size of the drawing relates to the level of self-esteem and that placement of the drawings reflects the subject's mood and social orientation. During the administration phase, client are given a blank sheet of paper and simply told to "draw a picture of a person". When they have completed the first drawing, they have given a new sheet of paper and requested to "draw a person of the opposite sex". An inquiry phase is often recommended which a subject answers specific questions about the person in the drawing - such as what their mood is, their interest, or what makes them angry. Koppitz (1968, 1984) extended the developmental and personality aspects of human figure drawings by creating objective scoring system for developmental level and emotional indicators.

Currently, the most frequent used version of projective drawings is the Draw-A-Person (DAP) as originally developed by Machover(1949) but greatly expanded by Hammer(1958), Hadler (1985), and Urban(1963), and Koppitz(1968,1984). Within clinical settings, formal quantitative scoring system for depression, impulsiveness, or maturation development is rarely used. Clinicians are far more likely to use intuitive judgments based on clinical experience and assumed an isomorphy between the characteristics of the drawing and the client's outside environment. However few of these interpretations are based on valid research. Given the lack of unified administration, scoring, or interpretation as well as complexity, diversity, and richness of the drawing themselves, it is unlikely that this intuitive approach will change significantly in the near future.

II. PURPOSE OF THE TEST

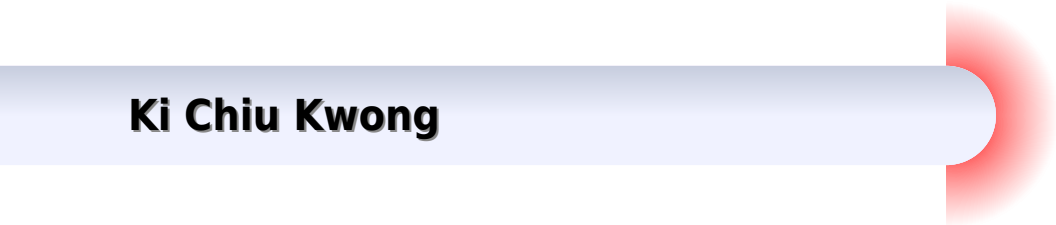

This test, DAP, assesses personality disturbances in the individual in psychotherapy, school, and research settings. This test may be used with the culturally disadvantaged, educationally deprived, mentally retarded and the aged. It usually presented to children, adolescence and adults. No time limit is given to this test and the scoring is hand key and examiner and examiner evaluated. The examiner is the one that provides the materials needed in this exam, like a blank sheet and a soft pencil, the paper should be placed in a flat desk surface and sufficient illumination. And on this test, the examiner must assume the subject's usual state or relaxation so that any physical tension may assume to be endogenous.

III. ADMINISTRATION

Regardless of the different variations in administration, the instructions are kept in a minimum. This helps to maintain the ambiguity of the situation, thereby increasing the likelihood that significant
