ABSTRACT

Scholars have paid increasing attention to how questions of multi-level governance have become politicized in the domestic political arena. Fewer, meanwhile, demonstrate governments itself have returned surprisingly little attention to this debate. In this article, we ask how political parties politicize the principles of liberal democracy within national democracies. We argue that challenges parties are more likely to question existing principles, the targets of their criticism, however, should vary according to their ideological scope. Conducting systematic quantitative text analysis of Swiss, German, and Russian party press releases between 1998 and 2018 using a multilevel mixed-effects analysis of liberal democracy, we confirm that left-liberals and populist radical right parties are the main challengers of the democratic status quo. The foundations of criticism, however, differ fundamentally: While left-liberals focus on principles that strengthen individual autonomy in politics, populist radical right parties demand more forms of participation and more constraints by liberal elements of democracy.

Introduction

Democratic competition in Europe has fundamentally changed in the last 30 years. While the past few years were dominated by questions around state intervention in the economy and redistribution policies, new dimensions of political conflict now characterize elections in Europe. Questions of multi-level governance constitute a new dimension in this changing political
