

MODERN COMMERCIAL BANKING

H.R. MACHIRAJU

CHAPTER 4

FUNCTION OF A COMMERCIAL BANKS

SPECIAL NATURE OF BANKS

Banks are financial firms and depend on economies of size and gains arising from internalising certain activities rather than relying on market transactions. Banks provide packages of financial services which individuals find too costly to search out, produce and monitor by themselves. Banks are also special as they not only accept and deploy large amounts of uncollateralized public funds in a fiduciary capacity, but also leverage such funds through credit creation. Capital represents a very small fraction of total assets of banks especially when compared to non-financial institutions. A minimum percentage of capital of 8% of assets is equivalent to a leverage ratio (debt/equity ratio) of $92/8 = 11.5$ which is unsustainable with non-financial institutions. Borrowers would consider it as impairing too much the repaymentability and causing an increase in the bankruptcy risk beyond acceptable levels. The high leverage of banking institutions does not interfere with their functioning because the discipline imposed by borrowers does not apply to depositors who are protected by deposit insurance. Banks require easy and immediate access to financial markets for raising funds as long as the perceived risk by potential lenders remains acceptable. The risks are however made visible and explicit by bank ratings.

The special nature of banks, creation of liquidity, carries risks unique to management of banks¹. The basic function of bank management is risk management. One would be stretching the point, if this is equated with the conferment of special privilege which calls for the imposition of an obligation to provide banking services to all segments of population on equitable basis².
