About Console and Auxiliary Ports

The router includes USB, asynchronous serial and auxiliary ports. The console and auxiliary ports provide access to the router either locally using a console terminal connected to the console port, or remotely, using a modem connected to the auxiliary port. This section provides important cabling information to consider before connecting the router to a console terminal or modem.

The main difference between the console and auxiliary ports is that the auxiliary port supports flow control, whereas the console port does not. Flow control paces the transmission of data between a sending device and a receiving device. Flow control ensures that the receiving device can absorb the data sent to it before the sending device sends more. When the buffers on the receiving device are full, a message is sent to the sending device to suspend transmission until the data in the buffers has been processed. Because the auxiliary port supports flow control, it is ideally suited for use with the high-speed transmissions of a modem. Console terminals send data at slower speeds than modems; therefore, the console port is ideally suited for use with console terminals.

Console Port Connections

The router has an EIA/TIA-232 asynchronous serial console port (RJ-45) and at least one USB Type-A, 2.0 compliant ports. See Table 1-1 on page 1-8 for a list of ports.
