Food policies and their implications on overweight and obesity trends in selected countries in the Near East and North Africa region

International Food Policy Research Institute ,Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations ,2020-12-16 Regional and global trends in body weight show that the Near East and North Africa NENA region countries especially the Gulf Cooperation Council GCC member countries have the highest average body mass index and highest rates of overweight and obesity in the world There exist several explanations that expound the high rates of overweight and obesity in most NENA countries including the nutrition transition urbanization changes in lifestyle and consequent reduction of physical activities This study examines the implication of food policies mainly trade and government food subsidies on evolving nutritional transitions and associated body weight outcomes We examine the evolution of trade food policies food systems and body weight outcomes across selected countries in the NENA region Egypt Jordan and Iraq In particular we investigate the implications of important trade food policies in shaping diets and food systems as well as their implications on public health outcomes mainly the rising levels of overweight and obesity in the NENA region We provide a simple conceptual framework through which trade policies tariff rates and domestic government food policies subsidies may affect food systems and nutritional outcomes An important and innovative feature of this study is that it compiles several macro and micro level datasets that allow both macro and micro level analyses of the evolution of trade food policies and associated obesity trends This approach helps to at least partly overcome the data scarcity that complicates rigorous policy research in the NENA region Overweight and obesity rates have almost doubled between 1975 and 2016 with varying rates and trends across regions For instance whereas body weight in the NENA region was comparable with that found in high income countries in the early years after the 1990s regional overweight and obesity rates became much higher than those in high income countries Specifically while most high income countries are experiencing a relative slowing of increases in overweight rates the trend for the NENA region continues to increase at higher rates The evolution of overweight rates for the GCC countries are even more concerning These trends are likely to contribute to the already high burden of non communicable diseases in the NENA region International Encyclopedia of
