Atlantique le Cameroun offre l'avantage de proposer un ensemble représentatif des climats régionaux rencontrés en Afrique tropicale. La diminution des cumuls de précipitations enregistrée dans la région pendant la seconde moitié du XX^e siècle est associée à la récurrence de périodes anormalement sèches essentiellement au cours de la saison des pluies. Ces conditions ont amplifié la dégradation du couvert végétal au travers des contraintes socio-économiques et démographiques de déforestation, extension des surfaces d'activités. Les conséquences souvent dommageables de la variabilité climatique en général et des sécheresses en particulier sur les hommes et leurs activités suscitent l'intérêt de développer des études pour mieux comprendre comment le climat et les pressions naturelles et environnementales interagissent localement. Ainsi l'objectif de cette thèse est de diagnostiquer la variabilité multi-échelle saisonnière, interannuelle, intra-saisonnière, synoptique des précipitations et les relations qu'elle entretient avec le couvert végétal au sens large. À ces latitudes, est associée directement ou non la dynamique d'occupation et d'utilisation du sol particulièrement sur la période 1951-2002. À partir de données de précipitations observées (CRU), ponctuelles, les modes spatiaux de la variabilité ont été définis aux échelles annuelles et interannuelles par Analyses en Composante Principale (ACP) et la Classification Ascendante Hiérarchique (CAH). Ces méthodes de classifications ont permis de discriminer cinq zones climatiques différentes les unes des autres par l'intensité des cumuls et la saisonnalité unimodale/bimodale. Pour chaque zone, l'attention a porté sur les paramètres intrasaisonniers qui modulent la variabilité annuelle, telle que les séquences sèches, nombre, longueur, périodes d'occurrence et les variations des dates de début et de fin des périodes végétatives. La répartition du couvert végétal dans l'espace et dans le temps (1982-2002) a été étudiée en utilisant des méthodes de classification non supervisée (ISODATA) sur les données de NDVI (Normalized Difference Vegetation Index) 8 km de résolution. Enfin, des méthodes statistiques et de télédétection ont permis d'évaluer l'impact des facteurs pluviométriques et anthropogéniques (croissance démographique et utilisation du sol) sur la dynamique du couvert végétal en utilisant des bases de données plus fines (résolution NDVI 1 km, Global Land Cover GLC 2000 1 km). Ces dernières investigations ont été menées dans le Nord-Cameroun (6°N-13°N, 11°E-16°E) qui est la région la plus sensible des points de vue climatique, économique et environnemental.
