

Massimiano Bucchi and Brian Trench

There were Roman aqueducts before there was 'engineering', and science was being communicated in public before there was 'science communication'. For centuries, professional societies and academies have organised public lectures and demonstrations. There were times when science talks and public experiments were the hottest tickets in town. Popularisation, as it was called, was an integral part of the lives of leading scientists and scientific institutions. But specialisation and professionalization in science in the late 19th century progressively distanced scientists from public spaces.

Popular science had to be reinvented in the inter-war years of the 20th century when progressive scientists dedicated their efforts to explaining science "for everyone". In the years after World War II – and notably in a Cold War context – public communication and literacy in science became government policy issues. More recently, and increasingly rapidly, this explicit concern with public communication of science in policy, educational and scientific circles has spread through other social sectors and around the world. Public communication of science is a recognised policy issue and an object of study and analysis across the globe.

Scientific discoveries and research findings are constituted in the act of communication, that is, in publication for the attention and critical scrutiny of peers. Professional communication takes place by long-established means through academic journals, the best-known of which have continuous histories of over 150 years. The sociological and institutional characteristics of communication of science within and between scientific communities are distinct from those of public communication of science. This professional communication is sometimes referred to as 'scientific communication' to distinguish it from 'science communication', in which attention is given to the challenges of communicating often highly specialised and complex information with non-specialist members of the public.

Based on this distinction there have grown sets of professional practices, of cultural institutions, of educational programmes and of research activity labelled as science communication, or some near-equivalent. Public communication of science has often been conceptualised in terms of gaps and bridges between scientists and their institutions, on the one hand, and the rest of society, on the other. Scientists' alleged failure or inability to communicate with the public has been set alongside the public's supposed failure to grasp essential scientific facts and concepts. Science communication came to be marked out as a field of problems and misunderstandings, where natural sciences, social sciences, humanities, the policy sector, media and lay publics all occupied their respective plots in unfriendly neighbourliness.

That, at least, is how it might have appeared to the casual observer and that, to some extent, is how the issues in science communication have been played out – as a game of naming and blaming. But these

Normative Theory of the Information Society Alistair S. Duff,2012-03-12 There is a clear need for a systematic integrative and rigorous normative theory of the information society In this book Duff offers a prescriptive theory to help to guide the academic and policy communities as they debate the future shape of emerging post industrial information based societies He argues that information policy needs to become anchored in a left liberal philosophy which foregrounds a feasible permutation of the core ideals of freedom equality and brotherhood The information society if it is to be worth having at all cannot be allowed to be largely the outcome of the free play of market forces and technological determinism The social structure including the information economy must be subjected to a regulatory axiological system as explicated by some leading proponents of social democracy This text will be of interest to scholars and students at the cutting edge of information studies journalism and media computer science sociology politics philosophy management and law
